Exercise — A Fountain of Youth?

by Cy Brickfield

Exercise for the young has long been considered essential for proper growth and health. And most young Americans get quite a bit of it, either through athletic activity or performing today's dance routines.

But what role could — or should — exercise play in the health habits of older Americans, who often enter that phase of life after careers essentially free of strenuous activity. Can vigorous exercise restore lost vitality? Or can it be dangerous?

Dr. Herbert A. deVries, an exercise psychologist at the University of Southern California's Andrus Gerontology Center, has been conducting studies that are beginning to provide some answers.

Prior to coming to USC, Dr. deVries had been involved with a space program research study that kept healthy college-age men inactive in bed for two to three weeks. The inactivity caused the men to lose their ability to adjust to strenuous activity—they temporarily lost their vigor.

Wasn't the same thing happening to older persons? Dr. deVries asked. Might not the relatively inactive life that so many older persons lead account for at least part of their reduced vigor?

In search of answers, he recruited groups of healthy men and women, aged 52 to 88, living in a California retirement community. He saw to it that they first received rigorous physical examinations. Then, with their doctors' approvals, he launched them on a three-hour-a-week program of carefully controlled exercise during which their progress was monitored periodically by extensive testing. The participants did selected calisthenics, walking, jogging and swimming, and a set of static stretching exercises designed by Dr. deVries.

The results were amazing. In just six weeks, some of the participants who were in their seventies regained much of the vigor and physical function of their forties. Physiologically, they had become 20 to 30 years younger!

Specific results included improved heart function and breathing capacity, an increase in maximum oxygen consumption (the best single indicator of an individual's vigor), reduced blood pressure, loss of fat, improved muscle strength and a drop in nervous tension. Each of these improvements is, obviously, very important to continued good health.

It's clear, then, that you can benefit from proper exercise — whatever your age. But don't rush out and try to run a mile or play handball. Uncontrolled physical efforts are dangerous, especially for those in poor physical condition.

Most authorities agree that anyone over 30 should go to the doctor for a complete physical examination prior to beginning a fitness program—the older you are, the more important it is. The physical exam should include, ideally, an exercise stress test in which an electrocardiogram is taken while you exert yourself.

Medical experts state that your exercise program should follow these general principles:

• Gradual Progress. The key word here is gradual. The idea behind starting at a low level of exertion and gradually progressing to more vigorous efforts comes from a basic physiological principle: Exercise challenges the system, which responds by gradually improving its capacity to handle greater physical efforts. This process can't be rushed and you shouldn't try.

• Know Your Own Limits. Exercise only as much as is comfortable. If a feeling of windedness develops, or if you are extremely fatigued on the day following your exercise, you may be overdoing it. Another good safety tip is to monitor your individual physical response to the exercise; your doctor can show you how to take your pulse during workouts and can help you establish a "limit heart rate" (a specific number of heartbeats per minute that should not be exceeded during exercise).

• Frequency and Regularity. Don't be a "weekend warrior." To achieve optimum results, you need to exercise at least three times a week. Regularity is important. When you stop exercising for a prolonged period, you lose the benefits you've achieved. Scientists say that while one workout a week might help keep the muscles toned up, it probably won't maintain heart and circulatory fitness.

• Avoid Competition and All-out Efforts. All-out efforts are particularly hazardous for the older person; they are unnecessary. Dr. deVries found that his research subjects had to exercise to only 40 to 60 per cent of their capacities to achieve the benefits. Work only at your own speed to avoid overstraining muscles or placing too heavy a demand on the heart and lungs.

• Best Exercises. Choose free-moving exercises such as walking, jogging and bicycling are best. Swimming also is excellent, but relatively few men and women have the skill to swim long enough and far enough to improve cardiovascular fitness.

• Exercises to Avoid. Isometric exercises—those in which a strong muscular contraction is maintained over a period of time—tend to elevate blood pressure and should be avoided by older persons. Exercises that require bouncing, jerky movements should also be avoided—these can produce muscle spasms and other painful difficulties.

• Be Confident. Don't sell yourself short. Although most older people feel they have little physical capability, it's just not true. Remember 73-year-old Paul Fairbanks of Washington, D.C., who ran three-miles-per-hour for two and a half hours on a treadmill that was part of a float in President Carter's inaugural parade. Mr. Fairbanks did not even begin to run for fitness until he was 63 years old.

While there is no scientific evidence that exercise will lengthen the lifespan, it certainly can improve the quality of life. As Dr. deVries says, "Exercise might not add years to your life, but it does hold the rich promise of adding life to your years."

IN MEMORIAM

In memory of Adolphus R. Cyrus, who passed away 15 years ago, March 22, 1963.
Dear God please take this message to my loved one up above.
Tell him how much I miss him, and give him all my love.
It broke my heart to lose him, but he did not go alone,
A part of my life went with him, The day God called him home.

Sadly missed by wife, Margaret, children and grandchildren. 3-23-1tc

In remembrance of our father, B. M. Ferguson, on his birthday, March 26.
Gone but not forgotten.
The Family 3-23-1tc

In memory of our father, grandfather and husband, John H. Spiggle, who passed away 1 year ago March 22nd, 1977.
In my heart your memory lingers always tender fond and true.
There is not a day dear husband That I do not think of you.
Have you ever lost a loved one, Who was so very dear to you
One we loved so much and miss him like we do.
Have you ever had a heartache, or ever felt the pain or ever shed those bitter tears
That drop like falling rain
If you have never had the feeling
I pray you never do,
And when God takes your loved one,
He takes a part of you.
To know him was to love him.
But when life is over.
If God be so kind.
We will be together again and peace and love we will find.

Sadly missed by Edna, Ronnie, Mary Lou, Terri and Paul 3-23-1TC
